Click Browse and navigate to the folder you want the. The present invention relates to an image recording device, such as a copying machine, a printer, a facsimile machine or a composite machine (i.e. an electronic typewriter) that combines two or more of the devices, capable of recording an image by applying heat energy. Image recording devices are widely known in which a photosensitive material (a recording material, such as a heat-sensitive paper) for recording an image is exposed to light. The heat-sensitive paper which has a characteristic such that when heated at a predetermined temperature, a color forming reaction will occur which makes the image visible is heated at a predetermined temperature by the heat-sensitive recording material, thereby recording the desired image. With such a system, a copy or print is obtained by exposing a photosensitive material to light after development of the latter. There are, however, disadvantages. For example, it is impossible to erase an image recorded on a photosensitive material so that an image cannot be reused. To avoid this difficulty, laser printers have been used. In particular, an image recording device using an electrophotography system that employs a development system such as a xerography system is widely used. A laser printer has advantages in that it is compact and has high reliability and no maintenance. When an image is recorded using a laser beam, it is necessary to expose a photosensitive material to a laser beam modulated by image signals to render the photosensitive material luminous and expose it to a laser beam by a polygonal mirror, to which the image is to be recorded. The photosensitive material exposed to the laser beam is then heated by a laser beam heat source (a heating laser) to form a picture image on a recording sheet of a photosensitive material. A conventional image recording device using an electrophotography system has a heat-sensitive recording medium on which a photoconductive layer is formed. The heat-sensitive recording medium is in the form of a photoconductive drum or a photosensitive belt. The photoconductive layer is made of selenium or cadmium sulfide, for example. The heat-sensitive recording medium is charged by a charger. An electrostatic f678ea9f9e
